Subject: stop interfering with my rights to open government

Electronic reports, emails, tweets – anything produced electronically by elected government officials and government employees – should be collected, archived, and open and available to the public.

The records they create are not theirs, nor are they something the Public Records Board has the right to keep from the public. They belong to the people who elected them and to the people who provide the money that allows them to create these records.

Stop this nonsense-thinking that because records are created on a computer-related device they are private. Open and transparent government demands that these records be available and stored for historical purposes.

This is not your private fiefdom. This is public business.
